Another Wireless Hero.

In the wireless cage of the Alaskan steamship Ohio worked a greater than Jack Binns. But poor Eccles cannot capitalize his bravery in the amusement business. He went down with the ship, most of whose passengers and crew he saved by sticking to his post and calling for help until the rising waters enguifed the ship, the purser, the quartermaster, the pilot, one steerage passenger and the operator, Eccles.

It is one of those stories of instinctive heroism which quickens one's respect for human nature. Eccles' name men to which the fire and police services contribute so large a part, who risk their lives in the performance of duty without an instant's hesitation. Duty has become a habit and they stick to it as unflinchingly when the risk is fatal as when it is trifling. The Ohio struck a rock and sank rapidly. Eccles called for help on his instrument so effectively that two steam boats reached the scene in time to pic up most of the passengers and crew while they were still aftoat in the wake of the sunken vessel. His last messay, should become immortal in the records of bravedy. It was: "Passengers all off and adrift in small boats. Captain and crew going off in the last beat waiting. bridge of Central Village.
